First Episode of Fatal Encephalitis Syndrome Caused by Thogoto Virus, Colombia, 2014. In Colombia, the first cases of fatal encephalitis syndrome caused by thogoto virus (THOG) were diagnosed in infants hospitalized with microcephaly in 2016. The results of a postmortem were announced in December 2016. With the aim of determining the lineage and the time of introduction of this viral agent, THOG DNA was extracted from the brains of two patients and used as template for a polymerase chain reaction (PCR) targeting a fragment of the glycoprotein G. DNA samples obtained from tissue of 13 autopsies, performed in the hospitals participating in the study of this outbreak, served as controls. A G1b lineage of THOG was identified from the outbreak. The phylogenetic analysis determined that the virus was introduced into Colombia at the beginning of the 20th century, and that the cases diagnosed in the present study were part of the first recorded outbreak. This shows that the outbreaks that are currently occurring are continuous with the autochthonous cases first described in South America.

Transcriptional regulation of androgen receptors in neural derived pituitary tumors. Pituitary tumors are the third most common primary intracranial neoplasm. Neuroendocrine differentiation of these tumors is a well documented event in tumors of the anterior pituitary. The growth rate and metastatic potential of these tumors is directly related to the expression of androgen receptors (AR). The current study was aimed at characterizing the mechanisms by which AR expression is regulated in pituitary tumors. The expression of AR and AR-regulated genes was assessed in GH, PRL and ACTH cell lines, and in pituitary tumors. The response elements on the androgen-regulated promoters were identified by DNA mobility shift assays. AR expression was associated with the rate of proliferation of these pituitary cell lines. Transcript levels of AR mRNA in PRL, GH and ACTH cell lines were low (PRL > GH > ACTH) compared to normal anterior pituitary. All these pituitary cell lines responded to dihydrotestosterone (DHT) by an upregulation of AR mRNA and protein expression. The DHT mediated upregulation of AR mRNA was abrogated by the protein synthesis inhibitor, cycloheximide, and was blocked by actinomycin D. DHT mediated upregulation of AR protein expression was blocked by co-incubation with a ret
